★★★★★ RATING

See me if you've heard this one before. Brilliant college kids sitting in a dorm are inventing the future. Fearless of boundaries, possessed of new technology and youthful enthusiasm, they build a new company from scratch. Their early success allows them to raise money and bring an amazing new product to market. They love their friends, assemble a superstar team, and dare the world to stop them.

Ten years and several startups ago, that was me, building my first company. I particularly remember a moment soon back then: the moment I realized my company was going to fail. My co-founder and I were at our wits' end. The dot-com bubble had burst, and we had spent all our money. We tried desperately to raise more capital, and we could not. It was like a breakup scene from a Hollywood movie: love, marriage, and we were engaged in the event. We couldn't even agree on where to walk next, and so we parted in anger, heading in opposite directions. As a metaphor for our company's failure, this image of the two of us, lost in the rain and crying apart, is perfect.

It wasn't a total failure. The company limped along for months afterward, but our situation was hopeless. At the time, I had assumed we were doing everything right: we had a great product, a brilliant team, amazing technology, and the right idea at the right time. And we only went on to something, like we were building a way for college kids to create online profiles for the purpose of sharing ... with employers. Oops. But despite a promising idea, we were nonetheless doomed from day one, because we did not know the process we would need to use to turn our product insight into a great company.
